Crying Out

Rabbi Rachel Barenblat

Lonely sits the city once great with people\(^1\) -- her subways now empty, her classrooms closed.
Refrigerator trucks\(^2\) await the bodies of the dead
wrapped in sheets of plastic and stacked like logs.
Mourners keep a painful distance, unable to embrace.

At testing sites cars line up for hours before dawn only to be turned away when swabs and reagents run out.\(^3\)
At food pantries cars line up for hours before dawn creeping across asphalt until a stranger masked and gloved places a too-small box of food in the trunk.

And our children: the lucky ones ache
for their friends, forget what school felt like, cry for lost birthday parties and closed playgrounds.\(^4\)
Some wake in the night from nightmares of the virus, a rising tide washing everyone away. Some die.

We suffer anxiety attacks in the grocery store;\(^5\)
did someone breathe virus in this recirculated air?
Things we've lost: touch, song, trust, safety,
a year of childhood -- if we're fortunate. If.
Where are the seeds of hope on this darkest day?\(^6\)

We stay home to protect the vulnerable.
We pace confined spaces, memorize every inch of wall.
Our synagogues are shuttered, we are exiled to Zoom.
We cry out from the depths.\(^7\) Do You suffer with us, God?
Who will we be when the pandemic is gone?

\(^1\) Eicha 1:1
\(^2\) I fear our era’s defining symbol will be the refrigerator truck, The Washington Post
\(^3\) NPR report, spring 2020
\(^4\) To Be A Parent Right Now..., Esquire, July 2020
\(^5\) How to Deal With The Overwhelming Anxiety..., wellandgood.com, May 2020
\(^6\) Causes of Destruction, Seeds of Hope, Conservative Yeshiva / Sefaria
\(^7\) Eicha 3:55